BLOODY RIDGE 309!

Jerry Plotkin was a softspoken, shy young man who worked in his father's drygoods store in New Orleans, Louisiana, before he was called to active duty with his reserve unit last year. Jetty was a Sergeant in an infantry company and after a short period of training at Camp Polk, Louisiana, his outfit was shipped to Korea.

Plockin had been under fire before. He was a veteran of World Wat II who had seen action in the Normandy fighting and had been wounded twice by German snipers. So his was one of the cooler heads which prevailed when his unit advanced toward the enemy near Kujong-dong, Korea, on November 19th, 1950.

The U.N. forces were highly trained, well-equipped and valiant, but the foe they faced wete not exactly green troops, h either. Some of the giant Chinese matines against whom the Americans struggled had done nothing but wage wat for the last ten years, in one section or another of the Otient! The newly-mustered reserve units. therefore, soon were forced to give ground. They retreated slowly and doggedly, making the Chinese pay deatly in blood for every inch of tentitory gained, But nevertheless after the battle had raged for two days it was apparent that the U.N. had lost an appreciable amount of ground.

One ridge in particular was The wounds were superficial, of extreme importance to the outcome of the battle. Ridge 309 was a gentle slope from which heavy gun emplacements could command a death-dealing view of ninety per cent of the surrounding tetritory.

When Seigeant Plotkin heard that the Reds had taken Ridge 309 he determined to recapture it before the enemy had a chance to move artillety up from the rear lines.

Approaching his commanding officer with the opinion that the terrain in question was of vital importance to the outcome of the engagement, he volunteered to lead his squad in a counterattack. Permission given, he armed his men to the teeth and moved forward aggressively in the face of intense mortar and small arms fite.

So heavy was the mottar battage which greeted him from the very beginning of the charge, in fact, that before he took his sixth step he was wounded by mortar fragments. The wounds were superficial nowever, and ignoring the flying death which buzzed everywhere around him, he continued to lead and encourage his men until they had pushed into the Chinese stronghold and engaged the enemy in hand-tohand combat

When the tide of the battle had turned in favor of the U.N. squad, an enemy grenade was thrown in the midst of Plotkin's men, endangering their lives. Without stopping to hesitate, Plotkin covered the grenade with his steel helmet and threw himself over the helmet to take the full force of the concussion with his own body.

When the medical corpsmen finally reached him, his first request was as to how many of his men had been injured. While temporary first aid and blood plasma were being administered, Plotkin conferred with the non-commissioned officer directly below him in rank in his squad, giving directions as to what things should be attended to when he was evacuated.

His Silver Star citation reads in part: "His intrepid and selfless act saved several of his men from death or serious injury and was an inspiration to the entire command. Sergeant Plotkin's extraordinary heroism reflects the highest credit upon himself and is in accordance with the esteemed traditions of the United States Army Infantry."

CAPTAIN COURAGEOUS

On the morning of March 9, 1951, Captain Raymond Harvey of Pasadena, California, was ordered to take his rifle company and fill a gap in the line. He and his men were further ordered to knock our enemy positions which were bringing fire to bear on a neighboring company from positions in the gap.

Captain Harvey led his men cautiously forward until he reached a position approaching the crest of a ridge. Then, covered by cruckling fite from the third platoon, he led the first platoon close to the enemy positions. But the advance was stopped by the deadly charter of a North Kotean machine gun,

The machine gun nest was just ahead of the pinned down platoon, and two of Captain Harvey's men attempted to storm it and destroy the position. But the enemy emplacement spoke once, and then again, and each time the gun coughed one of Captain Harvey's men went down.

Captain Harvey then ran from his semi-protected position in the defile where he had waited, and zig-zagging his way up to the North Korean machine gun nest, he threw grenades into the emplacement, destroying all the enemy within. Then, exposed to a hail of deadly automatic weapons and machine gun fire, limit occeeded to the edge of the right occeeded to the edge occeeded to the edge occeeded to the right occeeded to the edge occeeded to the right occeeded to the right occeeded knocking off several of them before they knew what had happened, and getting rid of the third just as the soldier had reached his machine gun and was swinging it toward the courageous captain.

When he had wiped out the last remnant of resistance in the second machine gun nest. Captain Harvey waved his first platoon forward. But upon reaching the top of the ridge which he had so strenuously won, the infantry officer discovered to his dismay that several well-entrenched enemy positions on the other side prevented their further advance!

The intepid captain then moved swiftly down the slope, firing his carbine as he dodger along, and knocking out the closest enemy position. He fought his way to a foxhole in which five of the enemy soldiers were under log cover. Keeping up a steady stream of fire with his carbine, he advanced close to the position.

When he was near enough to insure accuracy he rolled a grenade into the foxhole, killing all five of the enemy.

This accomplished, be curned to call for first Lieutenant Richard C. Rogers, his second-in command. It was at this point that he was hit in the lung. Lieutenant Rogers dragged him back through enemy fire until they reached the ridge, where an attempt was made to evacuare him to a cear area. However, the wounded officer refused to allow his men to take him away from the scene of the battlel He continued to give his aide instructions in directing the neutralizing of the remaining enemy positions.

Only when the tide of battle was decidedly running with his men and he was satisfied that the enemy positions could be taken would he allowhis corpsmen to evacuate him to less troubled territory.

For choosing in so exemplary a manner to risk his own life to prorect those of the men who served under him, Captain Raymond Harvey earned the right to wear the highest award for courage our country can give, the CON-GRESSIONAL MEDAL of HONOR. To date thirty-one such awards have been given in the Korean war. Captain Harvey is one of the nine men who are alive to tell how they won their medals; the other twenty-two soldiers perished in the action for which they were cited.
